Among other things, this update brings more options for how users can interact with the device and its various apps. However, the company has yet to reveal the exact price and release date for the new HoloLens. HoloLens 1.1 includes a handful of improvements. It can now connect to most wireless networks, so it should be easier to connect to a WPA2 network and also see your phone and other devices on a larger display. It can also integrate with Cortana, so you can say "Let's get a [beer]," and HoloLens will provide you with a beer-ordering option. It can also use other media apps to help control the device, such as Netflix and Skype. To be more responsive, it now has a short-polling mode. That means the HoloLens will show the effect of voice commands when the user has started talking. It is easier to control with the HoloLens' voice commands when using the device for extended periods of time. To work with Cortana Microsoft has also added support for Cortana's Action Center, which comes with a new Options page. You can enable or disable it via the Settings. To help users find the right apps, HoloLens now displays what it thinks an app should do based on what a user says to it. You can also change the app's description, so you can say "HoloLens, bring the [band] to me." It will then show a list of bands and the one you want. In a similar fashion, it can help you find the right restaurant if you're looking to order food. It can also tell you the weather and help you start a new workout session. Now free of charge For the first time, Microsoft has made HoloLens available for free. It is the first device of its type available to consumers for free, and a small startup has already taken advantage of that fact. Unlocl, a company that builds apps for HoloLens, has released a video where it shows how its app called Triclops can use HoloLens to play 3D racing games. There are still a lot of unanswered questions about HoloLens. For example, what is the HoloLens'
