The present invention relates to an X-ray apparatus and, more particularly, to an X-ray apparatus with improved shock resistance for use in an X-ray operation. X-ray photography is a method of exposing an X-ray film by means of X-rays transmitted through the human body. This method has been widely used in medicine, etc. For example, when an X-ray film is exposed, high-purity aluminum, etc. is usually used as an X-ray film material. However, since the X-ray film is actually exposed to X-rays, the X-ray film tends to have its physical properties degraded by the X-rays or the metal component thereof, even if an X-ray film of the same size is used. In view of the above, some studies have been made to prevent the degradation of X-ray films. It has been found that the physical properties of X-ray films are significantly degraded by shocks applied thereto during transportation, at the time when X-ray films are wound up after being exposed, etc. Accordingly, it is strongly desired that the X-ray films be protected against shock, while being transported, wound up, etc. (hereinafter referred to as "shockproof handling"). To this end, it has been proposed to provide an X-ray apparatus with a shockproof housing structure. For example, in a conventional X-ray apparatus, X-rays are usually transmitted through an X-ray tube, and these X-rays are radiated by the X-ray tube to a subject through an X-ray shielding cassette and an X-ray sensitive portion. The X-ray shielding cassette is interposed between the X-ray tube and the subject so that X-rays radiated from the X-ray tube do not directly reach the subject. This kind of X-ray shielding cassette is used in a variety of forms, such as a plain cassette, an angiography cassette, etc., depending on the purpose for which the X-ray apparatus is used. Since the X-ray shielding cassette is subjected to various mechanical shocks during the operation of the X-ray apparatus, conventionally, its housing structure is rigid, so as to prevent occurrence
